What Are You Eating?

Dickinson asked the Russians.

Weeds!

They replied.

Everywhere the American historian, Thomas H. Dickinson, went he asked the same questions and the answers always were the same.

What is the population of the village?

Two thousand a year ago.

How many people have died?

Two hundred of starvation, three hundred of cholera and typhus.

How many horses and cows have been killed?

Eighty per cent.

How much crop did you get last harvest?

Five per cent.

How much has been planted for next year?

Little or nothing.

Have you seed for spring planting?

The government promised us two bushels an acre, but it has now delivered only two pounds.

How much wheat have you in the village?

The wheat is all gone.

How many are hungry?

Every one is hungry.

What will you do?

Starve, unless the Americans give us food.

The Story of a Great Nation—Dying

THOMAS H. DICKINSON, for four years historian of the American Relief Administration, pictures in thrilling narrative the greatest national tragedy of all time.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire no such story has been told as is contained in these fifteen authoritative and virile articles.
